For Picasso, Marc Chagall was the undisputed master of colour, following in Renoir's footsteps. He was also a great storyteller: Marc Chagall's work, with its imagery often fuelled by his roots in rural Eastern European Jewry, tells stories and speaks directly to the viewer's emotions.

"Bouquet de Renoncules" (English: Buttercup Bouquet), made in 1968, is regarded as the artist's declaration of love to his second wife: Valentina Brodsky. The farmhouse and fruit basket to the left refer to his home in Vitebsk in present-day Belarus, and it is probably also significant that Chagall has the iconographically obvious red rose surrounded by a wreath of yellow buttercups - the flower that gives the painting its title is found in many peasant gardens.
