Art History(s) - Renoir's "Dance at Le moulin de la Galette".

There are two versions of Renoir's "Dance". One of them is housed at the Musée d'Orsay. The other one caused a furore in the art world when a Japanese collector bought it for 78 million dollars and announced his intention to have it buried with him when he died. The art world was abuzz. And happy when he sold the picture to a Swiss collector after all.

The loss would have been unimaginable: The "Dance at Le moulin de la Galette" is one of the most important works of early Impressionism. Above all due to its confidently executed Impressionist painting technique, in which every splash of colour carries meaning. He masterfully executed the colourful hustle and bustle. At the same time, the "Dance" demonstrates how a painter of Renoir's magnitude could depict the interplay of artificial and natural light. In addition, it is an interesting portrait of the Paris of his time from an art-historical point of view because it brings together Renoir's fellow painters and some of Renoir's models from this period, who also appear in other works, in a dancing round dance.
