Peltriaux celebrates a long-gone period: the 1920s when Paris was the artistic and stylistic centre of the world, where not only fashion but also the role of women was changing. His elegantly dressed ladies appear without exception as modern, even charismatic women who obviously know very well how much they differ from the generations of their mothers and grandmothers - along with how much they open up new paths and opportunities in life for their daughters one day.

This is especially the case with their self-confident approach to sensuality and sexuality: the title of the painting, "Nourriture Terrestre" (The Fruits of the Earth), alludes directly to a famous work by the French writer André Gide, which promised the young generation liberation from confinement and constraints after the First World War.
