Elegance in metal: In Oliver Franneck's sculpture "Papillon", numerous small butterflies merge to form a graceful female torso. For his works, the Munich sculptor initially outlines the contours freehand, cuts them out of metal with a laser and assembles the individual parts into the sculpture. This creates an intriguing dialogue between the shapes of the butterflies and the female nude. The transparency of the object allows for a fascinating interplay of light and shadow. With the fragmented depiction of the body, Franneck wants to create space for the individual fantasies of the viewer.
