"Mine alone is the country in my soul. I enter there without a passport," is how he once summed up the question of his artistic "home". Marc Chagall remained deeply attached to his Jewish birthplace of Vitebsk, present-day Belarus. As a young man, he blossomed into an artist in Paris, where he was seething with new ideas, and there he later achieved world fame. But the artist found his "home" less geographically and more within himself: in narratively arranged, recurring motifs that reveal a glimpse into his innermost being in the realm between memory and dream.
