Feininger discovered the hinterland of the river mouth Rega during his Baltic Sea stays. The river frames the small town of Treptow in western Pomerania, Germany, on three sides. The German-American painter constructs his picture from the medieval tower called Grützturm, parts of the town wall and the adjoining houses. But no matter how present the buildings may be, the blue of the river behind them and the bright sky intrude on the city motif. With his prismatic surfaces, Feininger makes visible the interlocking of the different levels of perception.
