Cyanotype:

The unique printing technique called cyanotype makes it possible to "draw" directly with plant material. A photosensitive solution containing iron is applied to an image carrier and dried in a dark place. The artist then arranges materials collected in nature onto the image carrier. After exposure to sunlight, the materials are removed, and the medium is washed out. Afterwards, the chemical process produces the typical blue colour in the areas that were exposed. The unexposed areas remain white or grey. Finally, the artist finishes her works with sprayed or painted acrylic paint. She thus accentuates light and shadow effects.
