Chagall and flowers: circus, cow, horse, rooster, a man playing the violin - there is a whole collection of recurring pictorial motifs in Chagall's work. Those motifs have long been the subject of comprehensive art historical analyses. Flowers are omnipresent in his works and have occupied him throughout his life as a pictorial element and repeatedly as a motif for individual works. A particularly beautiful example is the painting with the flowers against a red background, which he created in 1970. At that time, he was 83 years old and would have one and a half more decades of life and work left.
