According to a not entirely serious dictum, Picasso changed his partners as often as he changed his painting styles. This is quite a statement about one of the most versatile artists in the history of art, who influenced and contributed to the styles and directions of an entire century. However, it is a fact that women fascinated him throughout his whole life - including as the subject of his works - and he also fascinated women. His portraits and his homages to femininity are countless.

"Buste de Femme (Jacqueline)":

When Picasso met the 46 years younger woman, she worked as a ceramics saleswoman in Vallauris, where Picasso had been creating ceramic work since 1946. The artist portrays the 36-year-old as a perfect beauty and uses one of the oldest "tricks" in art history to emphasise the eye area: Jacqueline, who looks exactly straight ahead, follows the viewers, no matter at which angle they stand in front of the picture.
